Frequently Asked Questions

Should we be using temperature checks to screen for COVID-19?

Temperature checks are an accessible option for screening large groups. It is important to note that temperature checks are not 100% effective, and will not detect asymptomatic carriers of the virus, or those who either are not symptomatic yet or anymore. They are best used to complement other preventative strategies such as employee/guest self-screening.

Is there a specific type of technology recommended for performing temperature checks?

There are currently no specific recommendations from the CDC for temperature checking technology. Based on their recommendations for temperature checking procedure, those that can check from a distance of 6 feet or more, and those that are easily able to be rapidly sanitized are preferred.
